How it's made

The work involved in cleaning and preparing the rough clay belongs to David. He dries and then breaks down the 110 kg (50 lb) batches of the clay at a time, using a machine he designed.

The ball mill is like a rock tumbler that changes the chunks of clay to a fine powder. The clay particles are then hand-sifted to remove pieces of dirt, rock and vegetation, re-soaked to become workable, and stored to await use.

The entire process takes several weeks...
...and a great deal of patience.

Judy manipulates the clay into slabs then moulds them to form unique tiles, cylindrical containers, decorative cones, and flat-faced clocks.

Wildflowers, seaweeds, marsh greens are pressed into the soft clay, then removed, leaving behind a distinct impression, which she highlights with a coloured glaze.

During the firing process, a high level of oxidized iron lends the warm reddish tinge to the otherwise grey unfired clay.

One of a kind

These are a good representation of Judy's regular production pottery, but because they are all virtually one of a kind and not made from a mold, the pieces you order will be slightly different. As a result, your piece of pottery will be unique.

We try to have most categories in stock year-round but designs such as grape leaf, iris and the large leaves, are only made during the summer growing season.
